Origin Spotlight - Indonesian Sumatra

Sumatra Mandheling, one of our most popular coffee's in a dark roast with a strong, bold flavor and earthy texture. Here is some information on where it comes from.

The longest axis of the island of Sumatra runs approximately 1,100 miles northwest - southeast, crossing the equator near the center. At its widest point the island spans 270 miles. The interior of the island is dominated by two geographical regions: the Barisan Mountains in the west and swampy plains in the east. To the southeast is Java (another superb coffee, by the way).

In the east, big rivers carry silt from the mountain, forming the vast lowland interspersed by swamps. Even if mostly unsuitable for farming, the area is currently of great economic importance for Indonesia. It produces oil from both above and below the soil, palm oil and petroleum. Most of Sumatra used to be covered by tropical rain forest but economic development coupled with corruption and illegal logging has severely threatened its existence. The island is the world's 5th largest island, although only the third highest in the Indonesian archipelago.
